

GET SET.

"Competitive" describes the group of expert shooters who practice almost daily at the firing range. Riflemen compete not only in postal matches with schools nationwide, but also in shoulder-to-shoulder competition. MSG Marvin McCullough's shooters beat archrivals Airport and North Central High Schools and scored first of 12 teams in the Greenwood Invitational Matches.

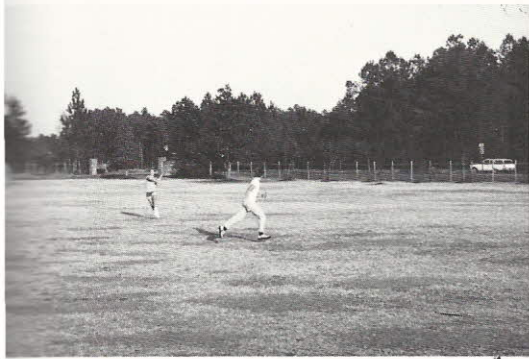

Tuesdays and Thursdays after tutorial classes, cadets fall out before the mess hall for calisthenics and for intramural competition in volleyball, touch football, and field sports, organized by Capt. Kenneth Long and LTC Jim Watson.

Pumping iron is a popular pastime for many cadets, including Ricky Coulter, an eleventh grader who has achieved remarkable physical development during his years at CMA. He and a selected few cadets supervise the weight room with its brand new Nautilus equipment. The staff advises neophytes on weightlifting techniques and "spots" those competent in the sport.

Besides organized programs, cadets may ride at the Camden Hunt Stables, play tennis on CMA's own courts, or cool off at the pool with its adjoining Carlisle House terrace, haven for applauding girlfriends.

A "B" Company player attempts to slam the volleyball on "C's" side during intramural competition.

Game of catch erupts on the parade field.

James Cooler displays his aquatic ability while airborne at the pool.

Match victor, just before skinning his nose on

Patrick Langley, David Hamby, Olander Banks, Ray Hudson, and Cliff Carter pump iron in the new weight room.