Class Disruptions

Students were silent, pencils were scratching, and the teacher was teaching. It was just another normal day at school, until someone became the class clown. Class disruptions were fairly common and almost everyone agreed, they were funny. Barry Segura, senior, said that he found disrupting class, "Hilarious, because I do it myself." On the other side of things, however, Shontoni Brown, senior, thought that when people acted out, it was annoying. Even as much as some students didn't like the clowns, the teachers disliked it even more. If you asked sophomore Trei Kellenberger what his teachers did after he caused a disruption, he would say that "They get angry." While some interrupted class to annoy, others do it for people's reactions. Otis Rhodes, junior, said, "I like to see people smile." All in all, disrupting class had it's pros and cons, but without it, school just wouldn't have been the same.

TOP On the way back to her seat, Kristy Corbett, senior, cuts off Mrs. Davis' teaching to finish her conversation with her friend. Despite being disruptive, she later said it was probably the funniest thing she had ever done in class.

LEFT Junior Joe Mandra gets ready to throw a paper airplane, a classic class clown move. Joe sarcastically said he would never disrupt class, but found class disruptions hilarious to an extent, a common reaction.

RIGHT Sophomore Samantha Helmey does her work for her Nursing class, only during Mr. Blackwell's Global Studies 2H class. Attempting to help out her friend Tori Sineath, sophomore, Samantha didn't realize she was such a distraction until Mr. Blackwell told her to sit down.
