School can be summarized in two major ways: grades and behavior. These are the key principles of any good institution of learning, so why shouldn't exemplary efforts in these fields be rewarded? From this simple idea came the entire concept of the PBIS, a celebration for exemplary behavior and grades that occurs at the end of each quarter as a way to let off steam from the stressful quarter exams. Each of these events are highlighted by the productivity and cooperation of organizations from band all the way to the cheerleaders and the school athletes. Every quarter, a good portion of the school's population turns out for these special events, showing that CCHS has an overabundance of good students who are ready and willing to have fun with their fellow student with nothing more than witty banter and playful attitudes.

"PBIS is such a fun event to let kids do their thing."

- 1 Two students prepare to play one of CCHS's famous PBIS games. This particular game, as with many others, pits the four grades against each other to see who can win. To win, the student must walk along on their hands and knees and knudge the balls with their heads to the finish line.
- 2 Sophomore Tim Hickman rocks his shades and cheerleading skirt while he cheers on the players in this year's Powderpuff football game! All the boys looked absolutely outrageous in their skirts and pom poms cheering away for the fighting girls.
- 3 A giant CCHS cheer erupts from the crowds of the various grades as they cheer on their champions in the games. School stress is forgotten during the first PBIS kickoff pep rally, and the jubilation erupts from the crowd in an unstoppable wave that just screams stress relief.
