You start your story as a child, learning how to talk, read, and write, learning which colors make which and the difference between left and right. Now here you are at CCHS, writing what seems to be the middle of your life story. You are learning new things about yourself and necessities for the future. For right now, you are here. You get up, put your uniform on, and come to school. You walk the halls quickly some days, other days you move through at a normal pace. You sit down in your assigned seat in class and leave when the bell rings.

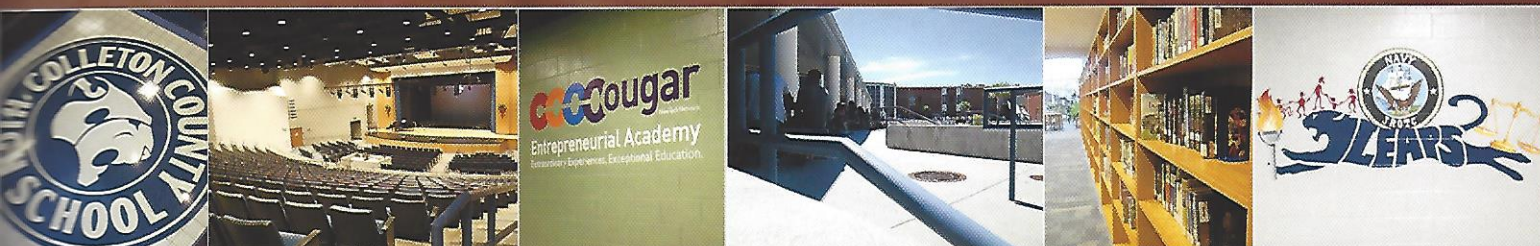

You have lunch with your friends, who you've known forever, and don't say goodbye when you exit the lunchroom because you know that you'll see them tomorrow. After more classes, you get to go home where you do homework and study. Maybe you play video games and watch TV all afternoon, not worrying about the assignment due the next day. You swing your arms around in the dark struggling to find your bed and drift off to sleep only to wake up to the same routine the next day.

You are here, right now.

You don't have to live the same day over and over again. Make each day different in a new way. Live. CCHS is only a small portion of your story, but it has a large effect on your life. Getting your diploma is a big deal out in the real world. Do what you can to insure a bright future. If that means studying for ten minutes after school, do it! All students should strive for success, but do you put in the work to earn it?

Today, right now, this very second, you are here.

Tell me, where will you be a few years from now?
