

7th Grade

A Year Of Learning

Advancing to the seventh grade was an adventure providing new challenges for these twenty eight students. In all of their subjects, the class found themselves very busy. A history requirement had each student write a report on a different S. C. county, while in literature, they made an in-depth study of Charles Dickens. For math, the class participated in an M&M's project, which allowed them to eat the candy after they had used it to compute problems. By year's end, the seventh graders were anxious for summer vacation.

David Padgett, James Troupe, Mills Hawkins, and Brian O'Quinn play soccer with sixth graders John Osteen and Jesse Filion. The sixth and seventh graders shared a P.E. class, taught by Coach Brittle.

Preparing for the next class, Douglas Lorin looks in his notebook for his notes from the day before. Being a member of the seventh grade meant that the students had to study a little bit more, but it also meant that they had more privileges.

LOOK WHO'S TALKING

“At the Junior High Math Meet, we did pretty well, even though the problems were harder than I expected.” David Padgett

“I was so glad that Mrs. Brittle let us have a Christmas party. We had all kinds of snacks and exchanged gifts.” Chris Zipperer

“I was a little nervous, but soon became more relaxed. The Spelling Bee gave us a chance to improve our spelling.” Travis Kronman

“Seventh grade is the first year that girls can be cheerleaders. I love being able to cheer for the team.” Erin Dutton
