

Looking Back

Time is a strange thing. There is no way of sensing it, hearing it, feeling it, touching it, tasting it, or smelling it. Yet, it is one of the most binding forces in our lives. Consequently, it is sometimes hard to keep track of time. The past and future often congeal into one big blur. "Did I go to Myrtle Beach last year or the year before?" and "When is my orthodontist appointment?" were a few questions that kept us all bewildered. However unclear the past and future may be, there is always today to calm the disorder and restore sanity. Today is the intersection of the past and future. Everyday is unique. What always has been, still is and probably always will be.

Everything that happens to us is a once-in-a-lifetime experience. So remember that this day — whenever it may be — is unique. Don't let it pass without giving it special consideration.
