

Junior Emily Warren checks her measurements for a titration experiment in Mrs. Griffith's lab class.

Survival — it binds the strangest of characters: shipwrecked strangers, prison cell mates, and high school classmates. There's something about being with the same twenty students for twelve years that forms an unbreakable bond welded with the agonies of algebra, history, and literature pop tests.

No time does a class become closer than its junior year. Eleventh-grader Kevin Beach said, "After successfully going through with the Haunted House project, magazine sales, and Mrs. Linder for a year, I feel our class has become closer. By being forced to work together to make something happen, it showed us that things won't work well unless a group functions as a group and not as individuals. Working together as a group causes relationships to be formed that might not have been formed otherwise."

United We Stand

“

Things won't work well unless a group functions as a group

”

People
Editor

Amy Gentry

