

Places such as Burger King hold countless memories and make a senior year complete.

Selling ads is a major part of the production of a yearbook. All summer, staff members hit sidewalks from Main Street to Jefferies and showed their biggest smiles in the hopes of making a sale. The first ad sale is always a trauma for the meek at heart, but for some the business comes naturally. Beth Gaskin, a first-year staff member, recalls her first ad sale. "I was nervous but they treated me real nice. The first day I went in Holly

Behind The Scenes

Myers Furniture they told me to see Mr. Johnson. He was real nice about it — didn't give me any run-around. After it I sent thank-you notes to all the people who bought ads from me."

Advertisements in the yearbook are more than just a needed source of money. They show the places, restaurants, stores, and shops that complete the picture of a high school year.

“
I sent thank-you notes to all the people who bought ads
”

Ads
Editor

Lesi Rogers

