“Being a student of my mother is quite difficult at times. Whenever I forget my homework, especially in her class, it’s bad. If I bomb a test it’s even worse.”

eaching my own children has been fun as well as interesting. I’ve had the chance to see another side of their personalities that I would have missed otherwise. All three have commented that it hasn’t been so bad.”

John C. Calhoun could be best described as “one big happy family” in more ways than one. Not only was the relationship between the students and the teachers close and caring academically, but many teachers and students were actually related. Mothers and fathers taught sons and daughters, grandmothers taught grandchildren, and aunts and uncles abounded. These students felt uncomfortable at times. The pressure to perform well came from both their home life and school life as well. If their grades were not up to par they would hear about them both at home and school. If a good grade had been rewarded friends would badger them constantly. As far as the teachers were concerned, they supported their kinsmen. Through the good and bad grades, the headaches and rewards, that parental care could always be found. Not only with the sons and daughters but with each individual as a whole.
