

A strong feeling of wanting to be number one was felt by the Rebel fans. The players felt the pressure. Percussion was added to their music. As each game neared, each participant wanted to do his best, contributing to the team to the best of his ability. As seasons wore on, the percussion got louder and faster — the pressure of bettering the record or adding another victory to it. The center of the percussion came from each player's trying to live up to his own expectations and maintain goals he had set for himself.
