

MR. MACK D. JONES as principal of a school made up of juniors and seniors is faced with a complex and taxing job. Being principal of Walterboro High means long hours of meetings: faculty meetings, principal meetings, human relations committee meetings . . . It means football, basketball, and baseball games and cafeteria meals. For Mr. Jones, it means long conversations with unhappy parents, teachers, and students. It includes writing letters to the Press and Standard, writing reports for the Board of Education, the Southern Association, and the State Department of Education. It means headaches, coffee breaks and long hours of planning for the future.

There are fringe benefits for Mr. Jones like attending a principals conference at Hilton Head.

Signs of concern grow in Mr. Jones face as he answers one of the many phone calls he receives each day.
