

Out of the Ordinary

Industrial Arts

Sewing machines sewed, hammers hammered, ovens baked and saws sawed. It sounded more like a machine than a school. Well, machine shops and kitchens were exactly what they were, at least for 50 minutes a day for the students who chose to take industrial art courses.

During the course of the day, students often got tired of the same old routine but going to these classes made the day more exciting. "Being enrolled in an industrial arts class kind of gives a break in the day, and makes the same old routine seem less boring," stated sophomore Kyle Beasley.

Whether one was cooking, hammering, sewing or sawing, these courses gave students the vocational training that they needed or wanted.

Giving Tony Stephens the cake she has prepared for him is Mrs. Linda Skelton.