

Paw Print in the Making

Among the students at Walterboro High there was a particular breed of people—people who endured hard work, withstood deadline pressures and produced a historical remembrance of the most enjoyable years of their lives. However, gaining nationwide recognition rewarded these people for their stamina, ability and participation.

The 1984 Paw Print received an Allstate rating from the (SCSPA) South Carolina Scholastic Press Association as well as being selected as a National Example for the Herff-Jones Yearbook Company. "Our yearbook, being chosen as a national example really does pay off for all of the rushed deadlines, the photo assignments, the copy to be written, and the headaches to be had. I feel we all deserved this great honor," said Robin Rutan.

The staff was a heterogeneous group that consisted of cub reporters, veterans and silent heroes. Five staff members and the advisor attended a summer workshop at the University of South Carolina. While there, Jennie Padgett and Robert Cuzzone received awards for outstanding yearbook ability.

Although producing the yearbook took time and effort, time out for fun and entertainment was a must for staff moral. A radio and regular birthday parties made the staff's pace a little less routine and picked attitudes right up.

After long hours at the U.S.C. Journalism Workshop, Jennie Padgett and Kim Hendricks decide Sue Bailey would enjoy a refreshing dip.
