

Your Attention Please

In general, the job of the principal was very uninteresting. However, there was a reason for this.

When asked what was the main element of school that bothered him, Principal Mack Jones expressed, "The expectations of the principal are too great. I'm spread too thin!" Mr. Jones was not able to give the personalized service expected of the principal because of the large enrollment of students. The one way Mr. Jones did communicate with students was by way of the intercom. An average student, in one day, only heard Mr. Jones, never saw him.

"May I have your attention please . . . If there is one selling point that I make constantly, is the make up of the student body. Basically we have a well disciplined group of students," expressed Mr. Jones in his final word.

Students, faculty and principals all have paper work. Mr. Jones has his share.

Sports fan Mr. Jones attends as many Bulldog games as possible.

Giving blood when the bloodmobile comes is not just a responsibility of the students but the principal's as well.
