

A Game of Dungeons and Dragons

What is there to do when you want to get away from everything and let your imagination run wild? How about an interesting game of Dungeons and Dragons? That's what Curtis Robinson, Peter Lommen, Rodney Stanley and friends played on weekends when they wanted to get away from it all.

Dungeons and Dragons is a game in which the controller or "Dungeon Master" creates a setting and a plot for players and their characters to go through. The setting can be anything from a forest or city to a dungeon or castle. The players then go through this setting, trying to gain wealth and experience by fighting hideous and supernatural beings.

"Dungeon Master" Curtis Robinson enjoyed the game because he liked to see the players' reactions to certain events. Peter Lommen and Rodney Stanley enjoyed the game almost for the same reason. Peter said he enjoyed the game because "it allows me to get away from reality and let my imagination take over." Rodney agreed, saying, "It gives me the freedom to do anything that I can't do in real life."
