

C afe' Corner

"a time to dine"

When students felt that familiar grumble, they satisfied their yearnings in several different ways. Some satisfied it with a pack of nabs and a coke. Others courageously ate in the cafeteria. Christina Fernandez, a senior from Spain, found the food in the lunch room a bit strange but soon overcame her fear of American food. "At first I was scared to eat in the lunchroom, but once I started to eat a little of it, I found that it definitely tastes worse than it smells, but you have to eat something." It seemed that Burger King, at both locations, was one of the major hangouts for hungry students.

On the weekends, Pizza

Hut saw its share of the student body. Large groups gathered at the local pizza place and laughed while stuffing their faces, and catching a flick at the local Drive-In. students consume large quantities of over-buttered popcorn.

After school, students would generally find something to eat at one of many fast-food restaurants, but for those who preferred something quicker, Pepper-Mart was the place for them.

During football games, students and parents alike enjoyed everything from hotdogs to pizza slices at the concession stand. After the game, Walterboro's own fighting "Dogs" and their rival team mauled a Big Mac at McDonald's.

For the true Southerner, Kentucky Fried Chicken offered a truly southern delight. As the California Raisin Fad exploded, Hardee's offered students the opportunity to own their own raisin and savor one of their hamburgers.

No matter where they were, the students always found a way to fill their cravings. Whether it was a Snickers bar in the morning or a bag of potato chips in the middle of the day, a student could always find something to eat and some way to eat it.

By Mary Bass and Monica Linder

Clowning at the lunch table is not unusual for Josh White. His friend Chris Turner tries to decide whether or not to eat his lunch.

Timely Trivia

Do you know many students eat fast food a week? Out of 100 students surveyed, approximately 96% of them eat fast food at least once a week.

