

Love In the Library

Media Center

The media center helped prepare students for school. "In the library I send pictures to my agent to put on my web site. I want to be an actor and a model so I also research modeling agencies," senior Steven Massey said.

Relief, relaxation, and research. It's an unusual combination but the CCHS media center provided all these things for the students. Despite the new library rules which were initiated for the 2006-2007 year and encroached on the student's accessibility to the media center, the students still found a way to access this much needed resource.

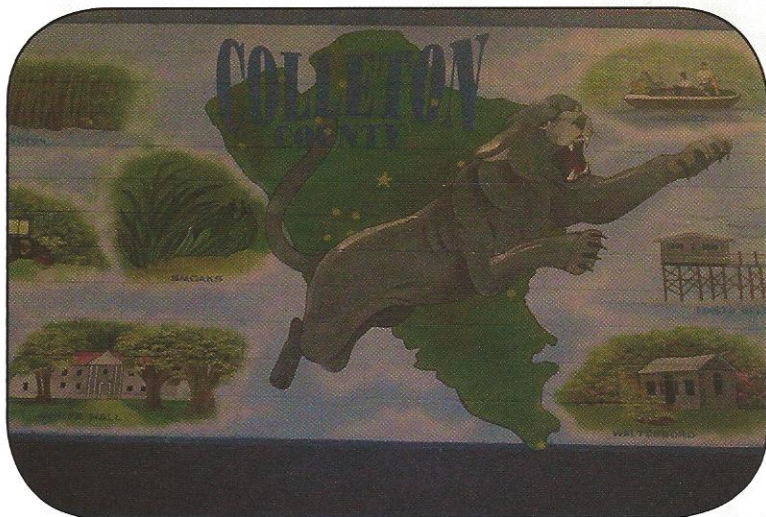

The media center was a go-between, allowing students to access the internet and connect with the world. It provided computers and other resources that otherwise would not have been available. Between, Discuss, the hoards of reference books, encyclopedias, anthologies and literary criticism collections, the library was an all in one combination for academic success.

"I come to the library because the lunch room is too loud. Also, reading keeps me calm," sophomore Crista Mack said. For the students who preferred peace and quite to the loud disarray of students that cluttered the commons area, the media center stood as a haven of solitude.

The media center, more fondly called the library, was properly placed in the heart of the school, because it provided stability and set a steady flow and pace for the school.

The new mural in the library, which was finished in 2005-2006 year, stood as a sign of heritage for some students. "The mural is really beautiful and when you see it you really appreciate where you come from," senior Rashad Towns said.

Cracking down her senior year, Jasmine Morrison tracks her grades like a bloodhound. "I come in here to print out my In Touch grades [to track them] for extra credit in Mr. Bullock's class and keep up with my ACT registration," Jasmine said.
