Explaining her expressive piece of abstract art, senior Margaret Cogswell displays the product of her well developed skill. "I wanted to do something graphic. The blue bars stand as jail cells. It [the art work] means getting out of the house, having my own freedom and not having people cage me in," Margaret said

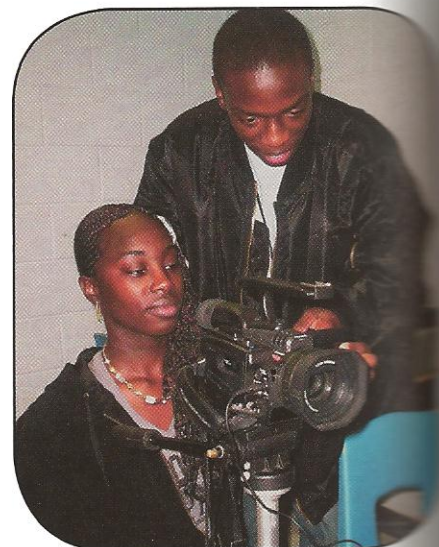

Some called them "kiddy classes" or "useless space fillers", but for the students who took them, electives were the much needed relief from the monotony of "core classes". The various electives aided in enlightening and diversifying the students by introducing them to new hobbies and skills. The means of self expression that the art and drama classes provided were balancing factors in the student's lives. Freshmen Sylvia Bering love for art was ignited in her art elective back in middle school. "I've loved it for all three years of middle school. I'm looking forward to taking it this year," Sylvia said.

The electives were necessary for the school to meet its main goal, which was to prepare the students for life after high school and usher them into a smooth transition into adulthood.

Retaining her love for art, freshmen Sylvia Bering enjoyed her Intro to Building Construction. "My favorite thing we did in the class was working with the band saw," Sylvia said.

Although she didn't have any intention of starting a career in video, senior Kamera Cox still values the class. "I like this class because we get to use our own ideas and do a lot of hands on things," Kamera said.
