

Nailing the Note

Chorus has always been an outlet for students in our school. Students participating have an opportunity to express themselves as unique individuals. It gives them a chance to channel all of their creativity and talent into something productive, like singing. "When I get nervous during a performance, I interpret all of my fear into power," mentioned sophomore Summer Standiford. This program has made it possible for students to have a future at doing something at which they excel. Chorus means a great deal to those involved and to those who attend the performances. Some of our students are even talented enough to place in a state competitor.

"I've been singing since I was six. My parents influenced me into joining chorus," sophomore Paul Murray tells us.

"I love to perform and be around people who share the same passion as I do," sophomore Emily O'Quinn explains.

"I've been singing since the 4th grade. It builds confidence and self-esteem," explained sophomore, Kanisha Gethers.

"I've loved chorus since I was five. It gives me a chance to express myself," explained sophomore Brooklyn Thurston.
