The Navy Junior Reserve Officers Training Corps program is an organization that is about order and discipline. The students involved in this program are training and maybe even planning for a life in the military. "What I like most about the NJROTC program is that it's like family and the drill meets are fun," said junior Andrew Hammonds. Students in NJROTC learned how to respect authority, which prepared them for boot camp. "I plan on going in the military to be an assistant, so I can have a chance to do all the paperwork that needs to be done," said sophomore Lauren Larrabee. NJROTC is an influential program utilized all over the US, and CCHS is thankful to be one of the most successful in the region.

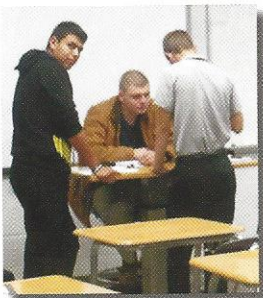

1. Andrew Hammonds, the student commander, directs the students where they should stand and what they should do.

2. Junior Alex Gadsden listens to the guest speakers speech before their inspection. "The best part of being in NJROTC is being able to increase my abilities and interacting with other cadets."

3. The NJROTC color guard kicks off the Homecoming Game by presenting the flags to the tune of the National Anthem.

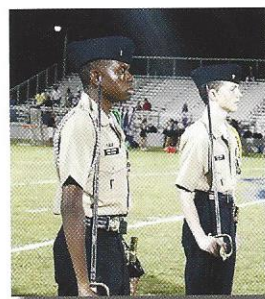

4. Sophomore Justice Riley said, "NJROTC makes me become a better and more constructive person, showing me that I can become a well-behaved citizen."

Sophomore Tara Shider is awaiting the annual inspection from the Commander.
