

SENIOR SLAM

Wyatt O'Quinn (11, above) pushes his opponent into the mat. O'Quinn, a veteran of the team, warns against cockiness: "Even in the last 3 seconds of the match, and you're 5 points down, you can pull through. But, well, they can too, if you're not careful."

Senior Hunter Preston spectates. "I've had such an improvement; I don't want it to end," he said.

Senior Nicholas Wilkey takes his opponent to the mat with speed and power. Nick regularly practices with partners well above his weight class.

Wyatt O'Quinn (11, above) pushes his opponent into the mat. O'Quinn, a veteran of the team, warns against cockiness: "Even in the last 3 seconds of the match, and you're 5 points down, you can pull through. But, well, they can too, if you're not careful."

Amarie Daniels (left) practices turnovers on Terreak Gadson (11). Daniels, an 8th grader, had only one loss this season.

Wyatt O'Quinn faces off. This moment, just before the whistle blows, is when "practice is really put to the test," teammates say. Coach Packy tells his wrestlers to "never give their partners a move, because rivals never will."

Terrance Calloway prevents his opponent's crossover lock. Control is pivotal to wrestling.

Tyrese Pressey (11), after a victory in Chapin: Pressey is considered the best sparring partner, thanks to his intensity and strength.