

A Year Worth

Sharing

Memories were not worth having unless there was someone to share them with — special times spent with special people. It was hard to remember who became friends first. Just one warm smile paved the way to a new and lasting friendship.

As the year progressed, so did the relationships between classmates. They became more than just friends; they were family. Each shared his trust, fears, and inner most secrets with the other, forming a special bond of loyalty between the two.

As the year came to a close, a sense of sadness could be felt in the halls. With summer ahead, friends would go their separate ways — graduating, moving to the beach, working summer jobs. Although they would be apart, their wonderful memories would not be forgotten. Unfortunately, the school year ended, but the friendships made between students and faculty never died.

This could be a start to a beautiful relationship. Vivion Hiott and William Cromer share crayons while coloring their pictures. Don't they make a cute couple?
