

Marc Warren and Thomas Rowe are eager to set up housekeeping in their cottage in the woods. Learning about Charleston's history proved to be much more fun than classes ... but what isn't?

In addition to the work required of a senior, Madison Farrell, Marc Warren, Melody McGinnis, and Scott Moody take on the responsibility of being class officers for 1986-87.

Worth Looking Forward To

When they first walked down the hall as freshmen, the students of the Class of '87 had no idea that four years at high school would go by so quickly, nor did they realize how much fun they would experience as students at JCCA. As seniors at last, the Class of '87 began to look back upon the last few years of their lives to realize with a sense of sadness that they soon would have to say goodbye to high school football games, basketball games, pep rallies, and dances. They knew that it was time to accomplish the goals that were set so long ago.

As the end of the year approached, many students began wondering what the following year would bring. Feelings of excitement, anticipation, pride, and sadness filled their minds. There was no going back now; high school was almost over and the future lay ahead. Graduation would mark the end of high school years and the beginning of life as an adult; dreams and goals would be fulfilled. After graduation, seniors go their separate ways, but experiencing JCCA would enable them to get the most out of life.
