

DISCOVERING THE WORLD

Kindergarten: Webster calls it a class for young children that develops basic skills and social behavior by games, toys, simple handicraft, etc. It is this and so much more. Kindergarten, for some children, was the first taste of the world. Until then, their lives had revolved around their homes, parents, brothers or sisters, and their own wants and needs. Kindergarten introduced these children to the concepts of sharing and thinking for themselves.

Games and educational toys helped to teach the young students basic recognizing skills. They focused on one color each week until they had mastered a whole palette. The alphabet and shapes of squares and circles were also studied by the eager young minds.

Kindergarten, so many things in so many important ways, taught these students more than just tangible information to start off their education. This year served to open their minds and show them the wonder of discovering the world.

Ashley Gordon and Amy Nettles have fun while they learn their alphabet with Alphabet Bingo.
