

Teachers call class time a time for structured learning, but we students know it's more than that. We had to learn also to grow up, to make the decision to learn, to accept the opportunities the teachers put before us. We had to find out just who we are, and, more than that, who we are to become.

Most importantly, we learned that learning is not a part-time job — that all those times we shared with our friends, our teachers, the staff, were times of education in all sorts of ways. While we were learning how to conjugate verbs and to find the lowest common denominator, we were learning how to live. In the pages that follow the reader can clearly see that the (1988-89 school year) was A Great Year.

A Great Year

Mrs. Linder takes time out to talk to Mrs. Walker about her son's English grades.

Nicole Ray, a yearbook photographer, works diligently after school on the next deadline.
