

Y. F. C. Bible Club

The early meeting hour of 7:30 A.M. did not discourage Y.F.C. club attendance. The group, whose size doubled this year, found inspiration in searching the Bible for guidance in everyday living.

Through films, discussions, and guest speakers, the club endeavored to provide meditation and thought for its members and to present Christ's teachings as a way of life. The panel discussions dealt with such topics as "What is a Christian?" and "Is the Bible the inspired word of God?" The Bible quiz team, one of the club's activities, gained many victories over competitors from other schools.

This Webster club is a branch of the International Council of Youth for Christ. City-wide rallies bring the clubs from St. Louis high schools together for Christian fellowship.

"Bradford Street regulars," commonly known as dramatic bugs, are found with knocking knees at tryouts; in blue jeans and fantastically decorated shirts on set devising; with make-up-gooey fingers before a show; among props and scenery on dark stages; and just giving the world a verbal spin, in eager little bunches.

Instructive meetings and experimental plays, such as Chekov's The Proposal, were presented. Furthermore, the first cast of a major production this season was unusually large, the second was so small and so challenging that it was doubly cast, and the third one had exceptional opportunities for elderly character parts.

The children's play, The Clock Struck One, was a resurrection of an old idea of "Children's Theater." For it, there had to be movable sets and equipment, so that it could travel to the grade schools.
