

Office Assistants

Who are those busy girls who do all the school errands including delivering attendance sheets, collecting pink and green slips, filing cards, taking announcements to teachers and students, summoning pupils to the office, and many other duties?

They are the office assistants—the students who willingly give up their study halls to do the tasks that help the school function. These girls, under the direction of Mrs. Nell Bopp, are responsible students who maintain good grade averages.

Though they might be called “the women behind the scenes,” these girls deserve credit for the services they perform for the school.

Library Assistants

The flood of students scrambling into the Senior Library for books increased to tidal proportions this year. Conversely, the staff of energetic and helpful assistants was unusually small.

Since these volunteers are animated by personal attraction to books and a desire to direct people to information (as well as a pronounced dislike for study halls, says officer Christine Lehn) their work was nonetheless pleasurable. The sharply rising call for materials set them to the chore of speedily preparing nearly four hundred new “paperbacks” for the shelves.

To add to their fun and knowledge of library work, frequent meetings were held where the girls with the date stamps in their gluey, book-dusty hands got together and studied new facets of their jobs. At Christmas (and also in the spring) they momentarily washed their hands of such travail and had a purely enjoyable party.
