

When assembled, each piece shares a little of its hue to enhance and complement the colors around it. They all blend to project a more meaningful image of completeness. Each piece has a relationship to another—not even the smallest can be inconspicuously removed; for so dismembered, the picture loses its balance and beauty.

Our school is a kaleidoscope—a never-ending but ever blending array of students, teachers, books, classes, organizations, tests, grades—all blending to create harmony, balance, and most important, function. Each part is essential to the whole, and no one part rises above the others.
