

Students Seek Solitude

Edna Williams wonders when she will escape the confines of class.

We all needed time to ourselves to get our thinking straight. Problems were easier to solve after contemplating them in solitude for a while.

Even the most extroverted person required some time by himself to study or reason out difficulties. During these times of seclusion many hurried to study neglected material. Raw nerves healed when removed from the stressful world of book reports, lectures, tests, essays, and speeches.

Moments alone restored the energy needed to return to the world and face its problems.

Brooding over life's many problems, Diana Scott assumes the pose of "The Thinker".

Susan Weissenstein deliberates over her next course of action while waiting for class to start.
