

A Generation of Writers

Those who signed up for journalism faced a very busy year. The staff immediately had to begin writing articles and taking pictures for the first issue of the Dog House. As the publishing date drew nearer, the days became more and more hectic. Sighs of relief were heard after the first issue was released. Unfortunately, the team had to look forward to this three more times later in the year.

Besides publishing the school newspaper, the journalism staff worked on the yearbook. The staff, which met fifth and sixth periods, could be seen drawing spreads, typing articles on a computer, or doing 100 other things. Photographer Bryan Fralin was sent flying across the school for picture, after picture, after picture. Things, it seemed, were difficult all around.

"Being a journalism photographer has its advantages and its disadvantages," said junior Bryan Fralin. "An advantage is that the job itself is easy; however, it becomes difficult when people begin to scream at you because they need their pictures taken. That's a disadvantage."

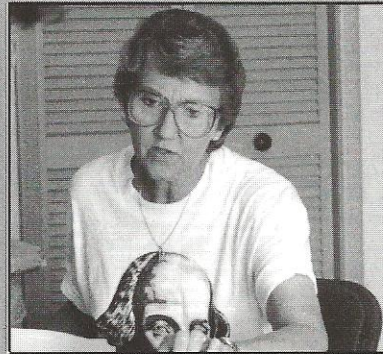

The two editors-in-chief were Kim Sapough for the newspaper and Bramlett Easterlin for the yearbook. Besides writing their own articles, the editors had to proofread all of the staff's articles. It was a real chore.

"Editing the newspaper takes a lot of hard work and dedication," said Kim Sapough. "However, once the product is finished, and I see a quality paper before me, I realize that it was worth the effort."

— Marc Stroble

"A journalism student needs to be an independent and self-motivated worker. Each student is given assignments and deadlines in which to do them. The student is expected to pursue the assignment without the advisors or the staff editors having to constantly remind them. When a student fails to do the assignment, it not only lets the teachers and other staff members down but also the rest of the school. The choosing of journalism students is based on their responsibility." — Janis Blocker, advisor

Bramlett Easterlin, Mrs. Marilyn Zielke, and Steve Karelitz discuss the 1993 yearbook. Mr. Karelitz helped the staff throughout the year. Mrs. Zielke was the yearbook advisor.

