

Moonlighting Teachers

Teachers earn extra dollars by working extra hours.

The teaching profession is not a big money-making job. It pays enough money to support a family, but excess money is non-existent.

Many teachers "moonlight" by working other jobs at night or on the weekends to earn extra money.

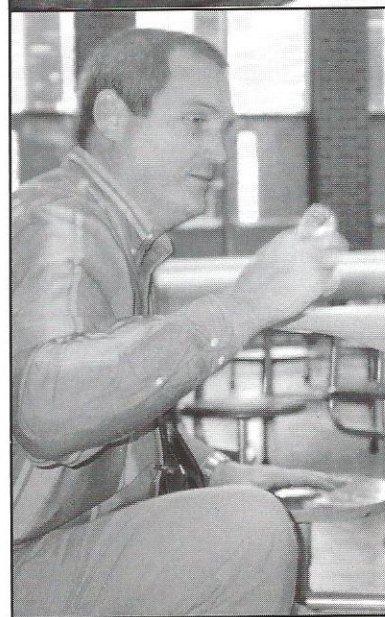

Mrs. Ruth Allgood, who taught U.S. History, also ran the Hendersonville Daylily Nursery in addition to helping her husband run his business.

"Working three jobs can be hectic, but it keeps me busy, and the money never hurts," said Mrs. Allgood.

Mrs. Sharon Courtney, a foreign language teacher, was a teller at the Enterprise bank during the summer and holidays. She has held that extra job for four years.

"I work during the summer because I hate sitting around the house all day; it also gives me some extra mad money," said Mrs. Courtney.

— Robin Bullock

To Grade and Not to Grade. History teacher Mrs. Ruth Allgood works steadily grading papers during her free period. Along with teaching, Mrs. Allgood had two other jobs that occupied her time.

Go Dogs. Athletic Director Leroy Riley is decorating the commons for the annual football banquet. The football team, under the leadership of Coach Riley, was 4-A conference champs.